Equality and "Anti-Discrimination". A relatively new phenomenon in western legal culture is the proliferation of legislation that is designed to "fight discrimination" and to "promote equality". In the United States, such policies acquired certain notoriety as "affirmative action" from the 1960s onwards, whereas in Europe the EU has adopted a series of "Anti-Discrimination Directives" and has defined "equality" as one of the fundamental rights in the EU.

Equality and "Anti-Discrimination"

Equality and discrimination Hundreds of millions of people suffer from discrimination in the world of work. This not only violates a most basic human right, but has wider social and economic consequences. Discrimination stifles opportunities, wasting the human talent needed for economic progress, and accentuates social tensions and inequalities.

The nature of power is such that there is no equality to speak of; hence the notion of diversity is not acknowledged nor respected. The writer of the paper "Discrimination And Racism In Modern Society" looks into racism and limit it to the author's experience...

Discrimination And Racism In Modern Society Case Study

It is true that gender equality is most closely associated to women and women's rights, but if we are striving for true gender parity and acceptance to erase harmful practices and discrimination, it's also important to recognise all genders, including men. In recent years, recognition of other gender identities has become more widespread.
