Post-truth is a philosophical and political concept for "the disappearance of shared standards for truth" and the "disappearance of the idea that there can or should be such standards." Post-truth discourse is often contrasted with the forms taken by scientific methods and inquiry.

Post-truth politics is a form of public discourse that prioritizes manipulation and simplification above accuracy and detail. It is characterized by the use of emotional appeals to influence public opinion, even when those opinions are based on untruths or half-truths.

Post-truth is not a new concept; it has existed throughout history in various forms, but it has taken on new urgency in the digital age. With the rise of social media and other forms of online communication, post-truth discourse has become even more prevalent. It is often associated with the so-called "post-truth" era, a period in which objective facts are deemed irrelevant or less important than subjective beliefs and opinions.

Post-truth politics is often used by those in power to manipulate public opinion and maintain control. It is often used by political leaders to create narratives that are convenient for their own political purposes, and it is often used by those in power to silence or suppress opposing viewpoints.

Post-truth is a concerning trend, and it is one that requires vigilance and resistance. It is important to remain critical and discerning when consuming information, and to seek out sources that are reliable and trustworthy. It is also important to engage in open and honest dialogue with others, even if they hold different viewpoints.

In conclusion, post-truth is a serious and concerning trend that requires our attention and action. It is up to us to resist this trend and work towards a more truthful and open society.
